Resistance Rangers

We're a collective of volunteers from many different parks across the country- scientists, educators, rangers, and more- who believe public lands belong to everyone. That means defending not just the forests, rivers, and wildlife, but also the full, honest stories of the American people.

How do we acknowledge the good and bad of a historic figure?

Gustavus Cheyney Doane is a challenging figure. While he is known to many for his explorations and national park contributions, many Indigenous people know him for his connection to the deaths of their ancestors.

Doane served in the U.S. Army and participated in several expeditions in the greater Yellowstone area. His detailed journal notes and reports (including the quote shown here) played a role in future decisions to establish national parks in this area.

In January 1870, Doane participated in what is now known as the Marias Massacre, at which, the U.S. Army killed over 170 Piegan Blackfeet, including many women, elders, and children. Doane wrote fondly about this attack and bragged about it for the rest of his life.

This sign was ordered removed from the Craig Thomas Discovery and Visitor Center at Grand Teton National Park by the Trump Administration (Executive Order "Restoring Truth & Sanity") and by Secretary of the Interior Doug Burgum (Secretary's Order 3431)

Glacier National Park

The Air We Share

Take a deep breath. How's the air?

The Clean Air Act affords Glacier National Park the highest level of air quality protection possible. Most of the year, the air is clean, but you're not guaranteed a clear view. Air pollution travels with the wind. Many of us think of vehicle exhaust or smokestacks when we think of the causes of air pollution. But, the biggest impact to Glacier's air quality comes from neither.

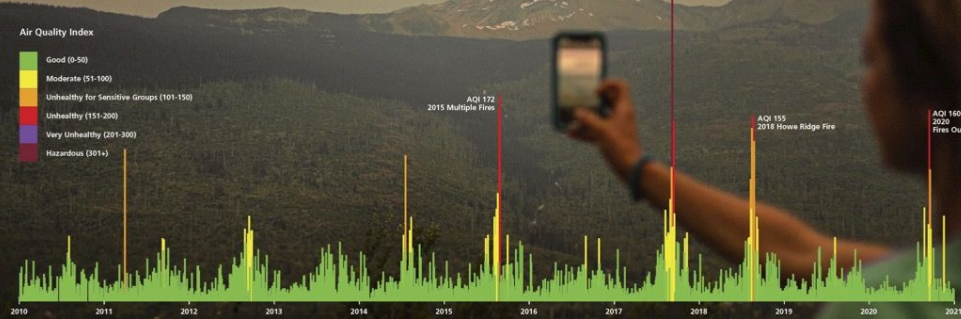

Wildfire smoke is the most significant air quality impact visitors may experience here. It can come from within the park, or from fires hundreds of miles away. During fire season, these skies can hang thick with smoke, obscuring scenic viewpoints and creating hazardous levels of particulate matter in the air.

Fire is a natural part of this ecosystem. However, historic fire suppression may have helped increase the frequency of wildland fire across the West. Climate change continues to make summer fire season hotter, dryer, and longer.

Air Quality Index

This graph, created by the Air Resources Division of the National Park Service, shows air quality data measured at the West Glacier monitoring station. Data collected in the park are used to calculate the EPA Air Quality index (AQI). The vertical bars show the AQI, which uses six color-coded categories. These categories show varying levels of air quality, allowing people to take steps to protect their health. Each bar on the graph represents an air quality sample. Green bars show that the AQI at Glacier is rated "good" most of the time. Other colors record times when moderate to very high particulate matter levels were measured. Unhealthy to hazardous air quality shows during the summer fire events labeled on the graph.

Junior Resistance Rangers...

Protect Parks

National Parks belong to you – help protect them! Stand up for nature, history, and democracy by becoming a Junior Resistance Ranger.

Who Are Resistance Rangers?

We are a collective of rangers (always off-duty), former rangers, and other friends of the national parks.

We preserve and protect public lands; we are America's history keepers and storytellers. Some of us have been illegally fired. Some of us are retired.

All of us are determined to continue.

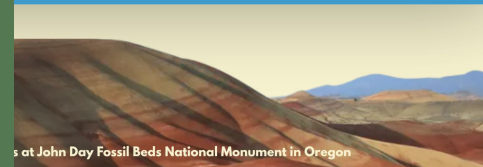

Join us on this uphill trail – the parks you love need you!

Junior Resistance Ranger Pledge

I pledge to be a Junior Resistance Ranger, to protect our parks, history, and science by speaking up, learning, and sharing the full stories of our National Parks.

Congratulations – you're a Junior Resistance Ranger!

Take Action!
